With an unrivalled reputation for quality and excellence built up over 30 years the Red Cross is renowned for providing world – class first aid training across a wide range of industries including window cleaning.

Window cleaning can be a risky business. Most falls to window cleaners involve the use of portable ladders. In recent years figures for accidents reported to HSE and local authorities show that between two and seven window cleaners have been killed each year in Great Britain and about 20-30 suffer major injuries as a result of falls involving ladders. Many more suffer less serious injuries that result in several days off work.

In the UK alone the Red Cross trains over 100,000 people every year across a conveniently located network of 180 venues. Using highly qualified and experienced trainers, course attendees are taught in a fun and interactive learning environment leaving with the skills and confidence to help save lives when an accident strikes. The Red Cross hold ISO 9001:2008 quality management accreditation and Investors in People Gold standard, demonstrating the quality of service and training you can expect when choosing to train with them.

Acknowledged by the HSE as one of the standard setters for first aid the Red Cross are now working in association with the FWC to help keep its members safe.
